Q: What to do when a good mentor became hostile? Disclaimer I've asked this question at the "career and job questions" Stack Exchange to avoid more community-specific drama. Introduction Earlier this year, I was on the verge of switching jobs. Then, I discovered a person who I thought was going to be a great mentor. I've learned a ton from her. Recently, our professional relationship has changed from mentor and protégé to mentor and potential threat to me, who has been mentioned on her company's automated followup email system. Worse, my mentor is less likely to respond to a question I might have emailed her about. The question What should I do when my mentor is rude, insulting, and/or a bully to me? A: I had a similar situation once. I think it's a part of the natural cycle. People who have a lot of knowledge tend to be more critical with it. At first, they take care not to offend you as much as they would like, just to be polite. However, after you've proven yourself, they start to "enjoy" being mean, as it makes them feel superior and it also isn't a big deal. The best course of action in my opinion is to just ignore it. You don't need to bother discussing about it, you don't need to care, and you don't need to prove yourself to people that you're not in your way. Just be happy that you got someone who treated you well. A: You're not the only one having this experience. I think there's a caveat in part of the "asker's" answer: your mentor isn't really being rude. They're being deliberately condescending to you. I've had the experience (in mentoring relationships) of someone behaving condescendingly, and then having the shoe put on the other foot. I've decided that I'm not going to be that person, so I can be very polite, and passive-aggressive in my responses. I try to put the other person in the "you owe me" position, so they see that I'm making a good faith effort to interact with them in a way that's not condescending. Some people are, however, out to prove that they are better or more experienced than other people. In that case, I find some truth in the other answer's.
